The relationship between China and the United States has been tumultuous. Sometimes allies, often rivals, the two powers have a long history of brinksmanship mixed with diplomacy.

Prof. Ifay F. Chang, PhD, has a vested interest in US-China relations. As a first-generation Chinese American, he watches with concern as mainstream media delivers an almost nightly narrative of anti-China rhetoric.

US-China Relations collects a series of sixty essays written by Chang for “Mainstream and Organic,” a newspaper column also published online. In his writing, Chang offers honest and candid reflections on the issues and conflicts threatening the US-China relationship. He delves into history, discusses media portrayals of China, and offers advice from the perspective of a US citizen with a Chinese background.

With China’s emergence as the world’s second-largest economy, hard questions must be asked about the country’s relationship with America. With the United States shifting the focus of its foreign policy to East Asia, is China—or America—preparing for an unavoidable war? Or can the two countries work toward mutual benefits and world peace? Chang’s opinions are both enlightening and guardedly optimistic as we head into a new era of US-China relations.
