The title poem, inspired by Philip Levine's "They Feed They Lions," explores where poetry comes from, what the influences are, and how to nourish one's poems. The rest of the book illustrates that the stories, sensory images and "flights of imagination" needed to create worthy poems are in our relationships, in our dreams, in the world around us. They are in the backyard where ordinary birds live, love and die, and where earthworms swim for their lives after a soaking rain; in a woman's memories of her deceased brother, and a child's horrific visions sparked by an overheard conversation, in an encounter with Jehovah's Witnesses and observations of Catholic mass. There are the homeless on the streets and in the park; and ordinary people coping with life-altering chronic illness. There is the lonely death of a parent, the impending death of a beloved pet and the difficult birth of a first child. There are the realities of modern life: identity theft, Bernie Madoff, our eroding environment. And there is Lois Lane pining for Superman and the Little Mermaid living a life very different from the one her father wants for her. These are only a smattering of what They Feed Their Poems offers, not the least of which, are the many lovely illustrations.
